

Mahjong all day long

Mahjong, Soybeans, and Sisters: Growing Up Chinese in Indiana

view in catalog

Auntie Yang's Great Soybean Picnic and Mahjong All Day Long

I'm a bit biased about how wonderful Auntie Yang's Great Soybean Picnic and Mahjong All Day Long are. Full disclosure: I'm from Illinois and I've lived in Indiana. And I'm moving to China in a month! (And I have 2 awesome sisters!) So, they're the perfect books for me, but they might just be great for you too. They are such a sweet celebration of family traditions, so culturally specific and yet so universally heartwarming, that I can't help but want to share them with everyone I know! So let's travel from place to place!

First of all -- life in Indiana. Ginnie and Beth Lo are second-generation Chinese-Americans who grew up in West Lafayette, Indiana in the 1950s and 60s. Their parents came to study in American universities and stayed in the Midwest. Mahjong All Day Long is a simple story about watching relatives play Mahjong, a Chinese tile game somewhat like the card game gin rummy. The kids puzzle over this complicated, addictive game, and the funny behavior of their relatives as they play it all day and night. As the kids grow up, they join in the game, and in the end, find themselves teaching it to their own children.

Mahjong celebrates the traditions and routines of family life, and the importance of making a home place that continues across countries and through generations.

Auntie Yang's Great Soybean Picnic

takes place in the great state of Illinois. Growing up in Illinois is all about ... family! I always found soybeans a bit boring, but in this story, soybeans turn out to be the most exciting thing in Illinois! On a Sunday drive while visiting Auntie Yang, the family spots a soybean field. Auntie Yang convinces the farmer to let her take some soybeans home. The soybeans are cooked, and Soybean Picnic captures that sense of home and connection that food can bring to a family and to the larger community.

Finally, these books are great because they make unique use of a Chinese artistic style. Beth Lo paints scenes of Mahjong games, soybean fields, and yummy meals onto ceramic plates in a style that echoes centuries of Chinese ceramic art. It's not a style you see every day, and it makes the illustrations feel very personal and full of life. Since the books are written by one sister and illustrated by another, they have a special charm.

Mahjong, recommended for grades K-2, and Soybean Picnic, recommended for grades 1-4, are a great pair of tools for multicultural education -- teaching kids about Chinese games, food, language, and celebrations and sparking conversations about how different families have unique but relatable culture practices. But more than that -- they're simply about the youthful realization of how family traditions can shape and guide our lives, even when we're far from home.

Posted by epackard on January 8, 2013

Blogs:

Oh, the Thinks You Can Think

Reviews Subjects:

Family Relationships

Sisters

Reviews Titles:

Auntie Yang's great soybean picnic

Mahjong all day long